About the Programme

A quick primer of some key computer science concepts, significant advancements made in the field of computing and legaltech, and what computational law is about. Law predates computer science, and yet so much of our world is run on software and computer science. Computational law asks, what if computer science was invented before law? And if computer science is applied to the legal domain, what would the future of legal work look like in that world?

Learning Objectives/ Outcomes

- To provide a big picture overview of what Computational Law is and how it can be applied.
- To position Computational Law amongst the prior art established on LegalTech, Artificial Intelligence, and the current state of affairs in the world.
- To help participants conceptualise potential applications and usefulness of Computational Law through the lens of the Rules as Code initiative.

Speaker's Profile

Alexis Chun – Industry Director, Centre for Computational Law, Singapore Management University

Alexis describes herself as a recovering lawyer, UX designer, and self-taught programmer. She is the Industry Director at Centre for Computational Law and Adjunct Faculty at the Yong Pung How School of Law, Singapore Management University. She is also co-founder and CEO of Legalese - a LegalTech start-up that is developing a domain-specific language for computational law.

Prior to Legalese, Alexis was a dispute resolution, technology, and IP lawyer in one of the largest transnational law firms in Asia. Handling both corporate advisory and commercial litigation, Alexis represented corporations on IT, IP, and commercial matters in court, advised on mergers and acquisitions, and was seconded to international banks to advise on Asia-Pacific regulatory compliance, financial products, and global risk management. As a consultant, she has been engaged to negotiate on corporate restructurings, data analytics, software & IT services, and international SaaS contracts in both English and Mandarin.

Alexis is an advocate and solicitor of the Supreme Court of Singapore. She has a Bachelor of Laws (Second Upper with Honours) from Queen Mary, University of London (2011), and was a 2008 recipient of the Long Vacation Scholarship from Cambridge University.
